Would Your Bank be Prepared if a Cyber Terrorism Attack Crippled the Basic Infrastructure?

Regulatory agencies require all financial institutions to have a business continuity plan in place and, at a minimum, to test the plan annually. Regulators are most interested in a bank's planning and assessment of the risks involved in a wide range of business interruption events.

The Association has partnered with The Navis Group to offer this simulation to help banks statewide comply with the requirements and take their business continuity planning process one step further – making your table top testing a bit more realistic.

During the day, participants will be confronted with a simulated cyber attack impacting the region, including attacks on our basic infrastructure - power, telecommunications and the Internet. The simulation will incorporate elements of a developing and growing crisis, complete with "unknowns" and the need to react, respond and communicate. The role of military, intelligence and other essential government agencies will be factored in.

Teams of six to eight individuals will work with industry experts to address the life-like constantly changing climactic situation. Team members will need to put their business continuity planning skills to work in restoring operations as soon as possible while protecting customer relationships, data, facilities and employees.

Benefits Include

- Updates on regulatory expectations
- Learning first-hand how to deal effectively with the paralysis brought on by an extended power outage.
- Improving your planning skills – a business process planning template will be provided as a "takeaway."
- Gaining a better understanding of the impact a disaster has on employees, vendors and the community.
- All participants will receive post-workshop documentation for your Business Continuity Plan documentation.

Who Should Attend

Compliance officers, retail management, operations managers, IT officers, and anyone in your institution who actively participates in the business continuity plan process. The focus throughout the day is on all aspects of the business continuity planning process, so banks are encouraged to send teams to gain the most from this important planning exercise.
